'It's Time to do Something About the Southern Border'

In case you missed it, this weekend, Congresswoman Susan Wild penned an op-ed calling for bipartisan, compassionate solutions to the situation at the U.S.-Mexico border. As Speaker Johnson chose to force a vote on a hyper-partisan messaging bill, Congresswoman Wild, a member of the Border Security Task Force, called on House leadership to work in good faith and put common-sense, bipartisan immigration legislation on the House floor.

Rep. Wild has been vocal in her support on the Senate-passed bipartisan border bill that includes the toughest and fairest immigration reform in decades and is a proud cosponsor of the bipartisan Dignity Act, which would immediately address critical elements of our immigration system and strengthen our border infrastructure while preserving American values.

Morning Call: It's time to do something about the Southern border

There is unquestionably a crisis at our Southern border — and this is something that almost everyone, no matter their political persuasion, can agree on.

Sadly, rather than fixing the problem, members of Congress have long treated the Southern border as a lightning rod to advance their own agenda. It is long past time for Congress to stop playing politics with this issue and focus on finding a bipartisan compromise. Politicians who want to do nothing more than rile people up via cable news appearances frankly need to get out of the way.

In February, after months of negotiation, the Senate unveiled a bipartisan border security bill that would have been the toughest and fairest immigration reform the United States has seen in decades. Yet even after members of his party negotiated the bill, House Speaker Mike Johnson declared it "dead on arrival."

And it isn't even the only bipartisan solution that has been drafted and ignored. In the House, I worked alongside my Democratic and Republican colleagues on the Dignity Act, a broad piece of legislation crafted by moderate lawmakers that would immediately address critical elements of our immigration system, restore order at our Southern border and implement long-term, much needed changes.

Many of us in Congress have proven time and time again that we are more than willing to work with members of either party on large-scale policy proposals to address border and immigration challenges. However, we are held hostage by the extreme politicians who continue to stall our efforts in the name of cheap political stunts.

No one is going to get everything they want, but there are good options on the table, if we can only put aside our differences and work together on behalf of the American people. So, when people ask me what we are going to do to fix our immigration problems, I ask them to use their voices, to be loud and clear that they want every member of Congress, Democrat or Republican, to demand that these proposed solutions receive a vote on the House floor.

It is my job to keep working on this and other issues in a bipartisan manner, and to try to find solutions that affect us all. I will continue to do that, even in the face of obstructionists who prefer politics over people. It is critical that every American hold their member of Congress to a standard that demands bipartisan compromise and real problem-solving.

Susan Wild Wins the Democratic Nomination for PA-07

ALLENTOWN, PA — Congresswoman Susan Wild secured the Democratic nomination for Pennsylvania's 7th Congressional District. Rep. Wild now advances to the November general election to take on Republican challenger Ryan Mackenzie.

In response to today's election results, Congresswoman Susan Wild released the following statement:

"I am deeply humbled by the outpouring of support from voters across this district, and the trust they have placed in me over the past six years to represent our community in Washington. It is the honor of my life serving in Congress, and I am grateful that I will once again have the opportunity to earn the votes of everyone across Pennsylvania's 7th District.

Rep. Wild will face far-right career politician Ryan Mackenzie in November's general election. Throughout his time in the Pennsylvania State House, Mackenzie has boasted about his "100%" anti-choice voting record, consistently opposed legislation that would create jobs and protect workers' rights, and enabled election denial and interference by encouraging lawsuits and efforts to overturn Pennsylvania's 2020 election results.
